

What We LOVE About Practicing Law

In the spirit of Valentine's Day, fellow GCBA members were asked what they "loved" about the practice of law. Below are some of the responses.

- What do I "love" about practicing law? It's those rare moments when a client whole heartedly thanks me for doing my job. -- Lisa Schrage
- I enjoy the intellectual challenge. I am glad to have a chance to provide a service to people in need. I enjoy the historical aspects of practicing law - trying to determine title to real property today because the courthouse (and records) were burned by General Sherman in 1864! – Jorgia Northrup
- I still love trying cases with excellent trial lawyers who epitomize professionalism. These lawyers possess a unique presence which can 'fill a courtroom,' with wit, wisdom and insights into the law as well as human nature. -- Judge Warren Davis
- Given the various areas of law that I have practiced, I love the fact that I am able to help a variety of people. From the Waffle House waitress who "accidentally" got a DUI to clients with billion-dollar budgets looking to settle complex litigation, I am able to help a diverse group of folks, and that's very rewarding. – Angela Couch Nguyen
- I love that I can be a zealous advocate for my client and still be courteous and respectful to counsel for the opposing client. I love the fact that I am able to maintain both a litigation and transactional practice in several areas of the law while simultaneously engaging in public service as a government attorney. -- Tuwanda Rush Williams
- Getting to meet and work with so many kind, and intelligent, individuals I would not otherwise have the opportunity to know. – Catherine Followill
- Arguing with people who are smart enough to win the argument and who care enough to make one. – Stephen Pereira
